THE BACCHIC-ORPHIC HADES

Yannis Z. Tzifopoulos

Death and man's transition from life to death have always and in every civilization been marked by specific rites.¹ The agony and fear of death (Plato, Republic 330d–331a) and of what comes after death have attended man since his first appearance on earth and have constituted a topic of constant reflection, particularly in ancient Greece. Depending on human needs (Plato, Republic 364b–365a), there appear two contradictory perceptions of death and how to confront it, both of which are found in the literature of the Archaic Greek world and mainly involve Hades/Pluton, Demeter and Kore/Persephone, and Dionysos. On the one hand, the eschatological notion of Hades, as described by Homer, Hesiod, and the lyric, choral, and dramatic poets, persists (see the Johnston essay in this volume), whereas, on the other hand, mystery cults propose a diametrically opposite eschatological view of the afterlife, to which the literary texts allude, only to reject it. The latter perception attempts to eliminate the fear of death by proclaiming that it offers the possibility of a new beginning. The mystes (initiate) hopes that in death he is reborn, raised to the status of a hero/god, and lives thereafter eternally as blessed (makar, olbios, and eudaimon) in a specific part of Hades, endowed with the characteristics of Hesiod's golden and silver races. The assurance of this sort of immortality, which in life is unattainable since only the gods are immortal, becomes the primary concern of the mortal initiate, while his passport to achieving this goal is his personal and less "public" initiation into the mystery cults of Dionysos (but also of Demeter and Kore).

These mystery cults were essentially similar, and indeed it is difficult to delimit overlaps or mutual influences between them (fig. 1).² Initiation was open and tolerant except for those who committed murder. Without discrimination for gender, age, religious convictions, and social or economic status, the mystes could decide at will to be initiated, in the hope of life after death. Evidence for the actual procedure of the initiation is scant, even totally absent, except that it involved things to be said (legomena), things to be performed (dromena), and things to be shown (deiknymena).³ In many mysteries, secrecy of the arrheta and aporrheta (things not to be said and not to be made public) was enforced, whereas teaching concentrated on an oral and apparently also written sacred text (hieros logos).⁴ The only certain thing is that the initiates (mystai)—those who through initiation acquired a personal experience of communication with the divine—are presented as having been reborn, with their previous views transformed, particularly on matters of life and death, and are referred to as olbios, eudaimon, makar, and hosios,⁵ epithets that denote perfect and absolute bliss and are usually employed to describe the "life" of the gods and heroes in literary texts.

These two opposite views on eschatology, expressed directly or indirectly in literary texts, appear to be followed in burial practices. For the first view, which stresses life and the things above the earth (epitaphic), the funerary stelai, altars, sarcophagi, inscriptions, and other earthly and consequently public grave markers constitute the tangible evidence.

For the second and more pleasing view of the afterlife, whose interest is focused on the beyond and on life after death, archaeological research has added a unique category of forty-six objects published so far: the “Bacchic-Orphic” incised gold (and one silver) lamellae (epistomia), with which some initiates were buried.⁶ The choice of eternal, incorruptible, and immortal gold (and silver, in a single instance in Paestum, Italy) as the most suitable material for these epistomia is anything but fortuitous, because it symbolizes the golden and silver races of Hesiod, which the initiates believed were not at all bygone but still attainable through initiation, even in the underworld.

These paper-thin epistomia, in a rectangular or mouthlike shape or in the form of an olive, myrtle, or ivy leaf,⁷ were entaphic (fig. 2a, b); they accompanied the initiate after death into the underworld and were not intended for the general public; otherwise their texts would have been inscribed on grave stelai in the manner of epigrams. The precise findspot of all the epistomia inside the graves is not known: they were used literally as mouth bands over or inside the deceased’s mouth, probably for practical as well as other reasons, as is still done today, or they were placed on the chest or in one of the hands. The text incised on them was in essence the words that the deceased addressed to the rulers of the underworld, mainly to Persephone, either in person or through an intermediary who would read the message on behalf of the deceased.⁸

The small corpus of these forty-six epistomia (all incised except four) presents a ritual and a hieros logos—in parte or in toto—but exactly what kind of ritual and sacred text is still a matter of debate. The opinio communis concurs in only one thing: these texts relate to a ritual and/or mystery cult whose emphasis is on the afterlife. Despite scrutiny, the origin and context of the texts remain elusive, because of the nature of the evidence. Interpretations abound, however, and the study of these texts has generated arguments relating the engraved epistomia to Orphica, Pythagorica, Eleusiniaca, Bacchica, and even Orphicodionysiaca.⁹ Although few scholars, if any, today would maintain the exclusively Eleusinian or Pythagorean character of these texts, consensus is, expectedly, not within reach. These texts are consistently referred to—for lack of a better word—as Orphic or Bacchic with Pythagorean influences (often in quotation marks or with the qualification “so-called”), despite facts that seem to militate against these epithets: Orpheus is found nowhere in these texts; the deceased’s regeneration does not necessarily entail metempsychosis (at least the metempsychosis Pythagoras and Empedocles meant)¹⁰; evidence for Orphic rites depends more or less on the epistomia’s texts, which thus portray Orphism as interested primarily if not exclusively in eschatology.

Even so, the forty-six texts incised on the gold epistomia, sixteen of which are presented in this catalogue (cat. nos. 93–103, 105–108), constitute different versions of a mystery cult with a specific set of views and perceptions of the afterlife, a mystery cult of Bacchic Dionysos.¹¹ The relationship between Orpheus and Dionysos is not easy to trace in the literary and other sources, and designating practices and texts collectively as “Orphic” does not promote, or can even obscure, a better understanding of them. More specifically, the hieros logos of the “Orphic” mysteries, if ever there were such mysteries, proclaimed Orpheus as a symbolic leader, founder, and organizer of rites whose death reflected that of the god Dionysos-Zagreus. The surviving material relating to Orpheus and his teachings is contradictory, although it is not certain whether or not Orpheus was an historical figure (fig. 3). In any case, since Orpheus is associated with both Apollon and Dionysos, he is not fully identified with either of these two opposite (at least superficially) divinities. According to the sources about the Orphics,¹² Orpheus, son of Oiagros and Kalliope or another Muse, was a formidable musician, diviner, and poet who reformed among other things the Dionysiac rites and cult in Thrace, an act that caused his dreadful death, although accounts about it vary. This “strange” relationship of Orpheus and Dionysos is also extended to the personae/masks the two shared: Dionysos the bacchos, the mantis and prophet, the telestes and poet, the initiator of rituals and poetics, the transformer of humans after death into heroes and gods (fig. 4). These are but a few of the many personae of Dionysos, at least as many as Orpheus had: Orpheus the Argonaut, the foreigner, the singer, the magician, the initiator / telestes, the husband of Eurydike.¹³

And yet even if the texts on these lamellae are labeled as Bacchic with Orphic and Pythagorean influences, and are thus securely placed within this religious-philosophical-literary context, it is by no means certain that all of those interred with the lamellae and epistomia (engraved or not) shared all or some of the views expressed in the Bacchic ritual, the “Orphic” rites, and the Pythagorean teachings. Moreover, the forty-six gold epistomia are synoptic in character, and in order to achieve their goal, they employ symbols (symbola), a part of the more general and more detailed whole, since even the one-word self-introduction of the deceased (cat. nos. 103, 105–108) is more than enough for the initiate to be recognized by those privy to the mysteries. The choice of text to be engraved was probably left up to the initiate or the person responsible for the burial, without any clear and specific criteria, except for the general rule that whatever was easily understood by the initiates and the addressees of the texts could be omitted as self-evident.

According to the choice of text, the forty-six gold epistomia, which date from about the sixth century B.C. to the second century A.D., present both similarities and differences and are classified in seven groups.¹⁴ Group A comprises five, the so-called purity texts, because purity is singled out; this does not imply in any way, however, that the other mystai buried with an incised or un-incised lamella or epistomion were not “pure.” Group B includes thirteen, the so-called mnemosyne, or underworld topography texts (cat. nos. 93–98). Group C has one, the so-called Orphic text, but this group should perhaps also include all related texts: the Olbia bone tablets, Bacchic inscriptions from Olbia, PGurob, the Edict of Ptolemy IV Philopator; and also PDerveni, PAntinoopolis I 18 (= MP³ 2466), *PChicago Pack*² 1620; a few of Poseidippus’s epigrams; the Orphic Hymns, and other related Orphica, among which are the epigrams of mystai. Group D involves five texts, in which Dionysos and/or Persephone (and/or Demeter) or other deities are present by name or by epithet (cat. no. 99). Group E consists of five texts, in which the chaire-formula is employed or implied in addressing the underworld deities, either Plouton or Persephone, by name or epithet, or both (cat. nos. 100–102). Group F comprises the thirteen remaining epistomia with brief texts, such as the deceased’s name, the word mystes, or a combination thereof (cat. nos. 103, 105–108). And, finally, Group G consists of four un-incised epistomia, so called by the excavators who suggested that they may have had a text written on in ink or other perishable material; for all intents and purposes, these served as tokens of initiates for the underworld, just as the engraved ones did; this group should perhaps also include epistomia that may have had no text at all, if the deceased thought that the placement of the gold lamella on his mouth, breast, or hand would just as well serve the purpose of symbolizing his initiation—an example of symbolic epigraphy par excellence.

Be that as it may, it cannot be stressed enough that these categories should not be understood as airtight,¹⁵ as their texts are interrelated and complement one another. The above classification constitutes one important objective in the study of these texts, which is based primarily on their strong similarities (the stemmatological approach). Another objective, equally worth the effort, is to shift the emphasis from similarities to divergences and, instead of focusing on one central document behind these texts, to entertain the possibility that within the same Bacchic-Orphic discourse on afterlife and even within the same group of texts existed simultaneously “dominant” and “peripheral” ideas and texts, for which local, or even individual, cultic and religious considerations may be accountable. Of the sixteen epistomia in the catalogue, numbers 93 through 98 are mnemosyne—or underworld—topography texts; numbers 100 and 102 are an example of the texts that address the lords of the underworld with the chaire-formula (fig. 5); and numbers 103 and 105 through 108 are single-word texts. Nevertheless, even the initiates who followed a specific burial practice differ in details: for example, text number 98 deviates from that of numbers 93 through 97, and numbers 105 and 106 are incised in a different medium than the text of numbers 103, 107, and 108, whatever the implications are for these initiates’ ideology on the afterlife.

Not all the initiates, however, chose for incision a succinct and abbreviated form of text. In Crete (cat. nos. 93–98), Thessaly (cat. no. 99), and Italy engraved gold epistomia have come to light whose texts vary in length from four to twenty-one lines and provide answers for the cryptic or abbreviated texts. These texts, some brief and some more elaborated, which fall into four groups (A, B, C, D), advise and instruct the deceased initiate, or mystes, in the following¹⁶: how to make his way to Hades, which spring or lake to drink from, what to watch out for, how to answer the questions that the guardians of the spring or lake will put to him before allowing him to drink, how to address the gods, and probably how to answer Persephone’s questions. The important similarities between these extensive texts from Crete, Thessaly, and Italy presuppose that their composers or engravers, who may or may not have been the initiates themselves, draw on a common tradition, which did not, however, lay down specific prescriptions, at least as regards the choice of the epistomion’s shape and the text to be incised on it. This choice seems to have been left entirely up to each initiate or to the person in charge of the burial and to the personal ideology the initiate had developed from his contact with the divine during and after initiation.

The twenty-three long texts of groups A, B, and D, most of them composed in dactylic hexameter and some in alternating dactylic hexameter and rhythmic prose, are crucial for an understanding of the mystery cult into which these deceased had been initiated, including those who had gold epistomia incised with a synoptic or abbreviated text. These long texts make clear that the deceased buried with an epistomion belong to initiates of Bacchic/chthonic Dionysos, and that, consequently, all the incised gold epistomia constitute the corpus of Bacchic-Orphic texts.

More specifically, in these texts the initiate is portrayed as reborn and is greeted as a makar/olbios or as a bacchos (i.e., Dionysos) or a god or a hero (i.e., she or he is deified or heroized), and henceforth she or he will be ruling among other heroes or dwelling in the seats of the pure or the holy meadows or groves of Persephone, all different names for the place in the underworld set aside for other divinities and initiates.

However, in order to gain access to this special place, which is the final destination of the journey, the mystes must successfully overcome a number of trials once inside the underworld (katabasis).¹⁷ The mnemosyne- or underworld-topography texts of group B provide a number of details of the initiate's dramatic condition inside the underworld, with emphasis on the initiate's memory (mnemosyne) and on topographical markers. In these texts (cat. nos. 93–98), the deceased is portrayed as parched with thirst that perishes her or him—a motif not unique to these texts¹⁸—and she or he must quench it by drinking from a specific, revitalizing spring or lake, whose location appears to be an important factor, because of the recognition scene that takes place there.

When in the underworld, the deceased will reach a certain place where she or he is confronted by guardians. In order to grant access to the water, the guardians ask the customary questions of recognition: “Who are you? Where are you from?,” and the deceased must answer with one of the following passwords (symbola): “I am the son of Earth and starry Sky”; “My generation is from heaven”; “I claim to be of your blessed (olbios) race”; “My name is Starry (Asterios)”; “I have this everlasting gift of Mnemosyne”; “Man-and-child-thyrsos” (andrikepaidothyrson), Brimo; “I possess the mystic rituals and rites of....”¹⁹ This dramatic exchange seals the initiate's fate in the underworld, as she or he is allowed to quench the deadly thirst and be reborn. This is aptly illustrated by the text from Thessaly (cat. no. 99), where statements, passwords, and the fate of the mystes in the hereafter are conceived as taking place in the present, at the moment of death (fig. 6): “Now you have died and now you have been born, thrice blessed one, on this very day. Say to Persephone that Bacchios himself freed you. A bull you rushed to milk. Quickly, you rushed to milk. A ram you fell into milk. You have wine as your fortunate honor. And you go beneath the earth, celebrating rites just like the other blessed ones.”

Fig. 6. Gold ivy-leaf lamella. Cat. no. 99a

The divergent passwords through which the deceased is identified as an initiated mystes should not create any serious obstacles in understanding the gist of what was intended. They may present different choices of text for incision on the epistomia of the kind we encounter in Macedonia, Thessaly, the Peloponnese, and Rome, where only the name, or the word mystes, or a few words are chosen to be incised.

This may very well be the reason for the divergent and conflicting (even if only in details) topographical scenery of the underworld presented by the texts of group B, which has always been a puzzle. The description of the two constantly recurring topographical elements—the ever-flowing cold water and the nearby tree—which the mystes must recognize, is not uniform. Thus, in some texts the cold water is running from an ever-flowing spring to the right of a cypress tree or the cypress is simply nearby. Or the spring is to the left of the cypress. Or, instead of cypress, it is a black poplar spring. In other texts the spring is to the right and nearby there is a white/bright cypress not to be approached, because that is where the souls of the deceased plunge to become cold²⁰—whether or not this plunging also implies drinking is not certain—and so the deceased is advised to move ahead in order to find the “lake of memory (mnemosyne),” whose cold water, after the recognition scene, the mystes will have to drink for her or his rebirth. In yet other texts, the spring and the white cypress near it are to the left, whereas the direction toward the second spring is vague. Or the tree is not a cypress but a black or white poplar.

All this strongly suggests that cold water with a nearby tree are connected and seem to serve as nothing more than marks or signs for the mystes in her or his way through the underworld. The choice of the cypress (not a chthonic tree in literature), its epithet white/bright (leyké),²¹ and the location of the spring to the left- or right-hand side are of special importance in this underworld topography. The cypress appears to be invested with what may be a new and distinct symbolism that becomes one of the central themes and trademarks of these texts: a tree in the underworld and intimately connected with the motif of thirst, it symbolizes the choice the mystes faces, and it is literally the limen not just of the underworld, but of the special place within the confines of the underworld, reserved for the mystai.²²

The divergences in the details of the underworld topography illustrated in the texts remain elusive and in some cases impossible to reconcile, unless the texts are emended in order to conform to an “original” Bacchic-Orphic doctrine of underworld topography, which prescribed specifically how the underworld journey should be accomplished and how the promised life after death should come true. But such a doctrine is nonexistent, except in broad outlines, and perhaps these divergences in details may have been influenced by local or personal considerations. The texts on the lamellae and epistomia provide some of the dialogue and the action, but what kind of performance and what was shown to the initiates is anybody's guess. The drama, reenacted constantly for each initiation and supposedly with minimal changes, must have also included some kind of scenery for the underworld journey.²³ Some persons (the priest?), would have acted out the roles of the guardians of the spring or lake, and perhaps also the roles of Dionysos, Demeter/Mater Oreia/Persephone, Hades, and perhaps Hermes. The whole ritual performance should have been so impressive as to be inculcated into the initiate, who thus would have no trouble during the “actual” journey recognizing the tree and the spring and remembering the passwords for the recognition scene. What may be astonishing, provided this is a plausible scenario, is that actual springs and the surrounding scenery may have been used as props during the deceased’s initiation. If so, this may also account for the “wrong” directions of the spring/lake.

The tree, be it (black) poplar or cypress, and the cold water spring are mythic stock elements, which, as Radcliffe Edmonds has argued,²⁴ do not illustrate a clear-cut operative dichotomy of left and right, but they can simply signify different things in particular texts. During initiation, a kind of underworld scenery and atmosphere must have been created for the reenactment and performance of the ritual, which may indeed sound far-fetched but is not unprecedented, as Merkelbach has documented the small ritual acts performed during the initiation ritual into the cult of Isis and Sarapis.²⁵ This “stage” for the performance of the ritual had to be plausible enough and had to represent as closely as possible the underworld scenery as imagined by the “priesthood,” for which sometimes real props, ready at hand, would have had to be employed, and which from one place to the other would expectedly be tinted with a local or even personal coloring.²⁶ Thus, the underworld illustrated in the texts of the gold lamellae and epistomia may be a unique combination, not only of stock mythic elements but also of “real” ones, which may account for the divergent topographical hints in these texts. The world above, more familiar and less dangerous, lends to the world below some real objects—a cypress or a black-poplar and a spring nearby—in order to render it less threatening, and thus more easily attainable.

Within the small Bacchic-Orphic corpus of the forty-six epistomia, there is evident differentiation. Different mystai felt differently and expressed their beliefs and attitudes in differing, perhaps more individual ways, as the shapes of the epistomia, the burial-coin practice, and the choice of the words to be incised amply illustrate. Some incise only their name, others a salutation to Persephone and Hades, others their particular association with Bacchios Dionysos, others longer texts, others nothing at all; still others, possibly the majority, declare their status as mystai with material evidence that has not withstood the passage of time. Taken together, the apparent similarities and differences between these texts, be they only in details, complement each other and the fragmentary picture of the Bacchic mysteries and the initiates of Dionysos.

Dionysos, however, has not one but many masks. The pleasing and optimistic perception of the afterlife and immortality of his initiates is but one face of the coin, the “entaphic” and consequently the less “public” and more personal one. The other, the “epitaphic” and consequently “public” one, is represented by a group of about seventy-five inscribed grave stelai.²⁷ These were placed on the graves of Dionysiac initiates (none of them containing an incised epistomion), they come from Macedonia, Thessaly, Boeotia, the Peloponnese, Rhodes, Asia Minor, Thrace, and Rome, and date from the third century B.C. to the third century A.D. The epitaphs of these Bacchic initiates present the expected conventional Dionysiac motifs: the vine, the wine, and the symposium; or they echo the common motifs of funeral epigrams—children dying young and parents at a loss by the death of their children; people despairing at the prospect of death. The initiates in these inscriptions expect Dionysus to help them survive and save them now, while they are alive on earth and not after death, and there are examples in which they even cynically criticize the god for having failed to protect their children or themselves from untimely or unfair death.

Between these two opposing perceptions of Dionysiac followers about the here-and-now earthly matters and the beyond and afterlife—or perhaps besides and beyond these perceptions—certainly more examples exist whose eschatological ramifications or connotations may possibly seem inevitable, even if the afterlife beliefs and ideology of the particular deceased are not easily detectable, except perhaps when a grave’s context reveals a Dionysiac outlook (fig. 7). All these constitute characteristic examples not of uniformity, as one might expect of initiates of the same or similar mystery cult, but of an individual ideology about the beyond.

Fig. 7. A mainada, follower of Dionysos. Cat. no. 104

All these different answers—entaphic, epitaphic, and other—to death and the afterlife underline the fact that religious attitudes and ideologies not only within a polis but also within a specific group of mystai need not, or could not always, conform to identical practices. The evidence reveals an interpretative tension and dynamic interaction between local and Panhellenic, central and peripheral rituals and mystery cults, burial practices and ideologies, and discourses on the afterlife. And it certainly should be no wonder if each deceased, even when she or he belonged to a group of initiates of specific eschatological beliefs and ideology, faced in a personal, sometimes idiosyncratic, way—the most significant moment in her or his life, the transition from life to death.

⁴ For hieroi logoi, see Graf 2011; Dousa 2011; Bernabé and Jiménez San Cristóbal 2011; Edmonds 2011c; Riedweg 2011; Faraone 2011. Baumgarten (1998) has presented an important contribution to the study of religious texts, such as oracles, “oramic” literature, hieroi logoi in mystery cults, the two hieroi logoi supposedly by Pythagoras, and “egyptianizing” sacred writings. This is a disparate miscellany, but it underscores the variety in form and objectives of what we might call religious texts. As Robert Parker (2000) and Albert Henrichs (2003a and 2003b) have argued, the terms hieros logos, hiera anagraphē, hieros chresmos, sacred writ, and the like are not identical, just as the theogonies, hymns, cult regulations, oracles, and a number of other texts are different entities. They all, however, constitute what we would call a corpus of religious texts.

²¹ Verbruggen (1981, 90–91) also suggested that the cypress and the spring may have originated in Crete. Comparetti (1910, 34) understood the leyké cypress as identical to the white poplar (in Greek leúke), but Guthrie (1993, 182 and 192 n. 16) was skeptical. Pugliese Carratelli 2001, 57–58; Bernabé and Jiménez San Cristóbal 2008, 25–28; Graf and Johnston 2007, 108–9.

²⁵ Merkelbach 1995, 147–81, 328–31, 343–46; the small ritual acts include impersonation of gods by priests, theatrical devices, machines, etc.

²⁶ Graf and Johnston (2007, 109–11) explain the topographical divergence as a probable innovation by an orpheotelestes, claiming that his is the correct knowledge of the underworld topography; this need not exclude a local context for the incised text.

I am parched with thirst and I am perishing; but (give) me to drink | from the ever-flowing spring to the right; there! the cypress. | “Who are you?” “Where are you from?” “I am the son of Earth | and starry Sky.”

The letters are carefully incised. The engraver has tried to cover the entire surface of the epistomion (mouthpiece) respecting word divisions and indenting the last word in line four, making the text approximately centered.

The text is composed of two dactylic hexameters (lines 1 and 2), two palimbacchiacs or rhythmical prose (the two questions in the beginning of line 3), and of dactylic rhythm (lines 2 and 3).

The very small and very thin incised gold foils were placed on the mouth, on the chest, and in the hand of the deceased, or they were folded or rolled up and placed inside the mouth, in order to convey the appropriate words to the underworld deities. By this token, the deceased was identified as a mystes and thus gained access to the special place in the underworld promised to the mystai during their ritual initiation while alive.

This is text B3, according to the classification of the small Bacchic-Orphic corpus of forty-six texts published so far, and it is the short version of the thirteen texts that make up group B (see also cat. nos. 94–98). It conveys the deceased’s condition and a brief stichomythy (dialogue) of recognition between the mystai and underworld divinities. This enigmatic text becomes comprehensible if placed within the context of the longer texts of this group (B1–2 and B10–11), whose synopsis it appears to be. The longer texts include additional details such as instructions to the mystai about underworld topography and the mystai’s fate after the brief dialogue of recognition. Apparently, the entire hieros logos (sacred text) could be thought of as easily understood, and it was not always necessary to incise everything on the small gold foil, in order to effect the action, in this case the entrance of the mystai into the paradisiac afterlife.

The lettering is very carefully done. For the text's alignment in the center, as can be surmised from the right edge where at least one letter space is left vacant, the engraver does not respect word divisions.

For the use of the lamella, see cat. no. 93. According to the classification of the small Bacchic-Orphic corpus of forty-six texts published so far, this is text E2 and belongs to the fifth group, which comprises five short texts, each of them a greetings formula. The short text, in which the deceased greets (chairein) Hades and Persephone, becomes comprehensible if placed within the context of the longer texts of group A and probably group B, where the greetings formula with the verb chairein also appears. The incision of only the greetings formula was thought sufficient enough for this deceased's recognition as a mystes by the underworld deities (see also cat. no. 102).

Boulomaga or Phylomaga (= Phylomachē).

The lettering is carefully done, and the letters are spread out to cover the surface of the epistomion. The engraver appears to have incised either a beta, followed by a small omicron which he later turned into a phi, or vice versa.

The lamella was found on the chest of the deceased female. For the tomb, see cat. no. 104. For the use of the lamella, see cat. no. 93. According to the classification of the small Bacchic-Orphic corpus of forty-six texts published so far, this is text F₃ and belongs to the sixth group, which comprises the names of the deceased or the word mystes or a combination thereof. These one-line texts (see also cat. nos. 107 and 108) become comprehensible if associated with the texts in group E (see cat. nos. 100–102), whose abbreviations they appear to be, since they omit from incision the greetings formula with the verb chairein as easily understood. The greetings formula also appears in the longer texts of group A and probably of group B.

105. Coin with Bacchic-Orphic Text

Gold

D. 1 cm, letter h. 1–2 mm.

From pit-grave no. 8 in the south cemetery of Pydna in the plot of K. Chrysochoidis, at the site of modern Alykes, Kitros in Pieria

Coin/epistomion preserved in excellent condition. The surface of the coin has been slightly smoothed in order to accommodate the incision of the deceased's name (in two lines) on both sides. The smoothness is visible in the upper half of the reverse, where the first four letters of the coin's legend are still visible ($\Phi\lambda\tau\pi\mu\sigma$), on top of which the name of the deceased was incised.

Obverse 'Avδ-
 ρων.

Reverse 'Avδ-
 ρων.

Andron.

The lettering is neat, especially in line 1. The gold coin is a tribemiobol (an eighth) of a stater of Philip II. The incision of the name cannot technically be understood as a graffito on the coin or as an overstrike.

It was found in the cranium area of the deceased male. This text is similar to cat. no. 103, and it is text F8, according to the classification of the small Bacchic-Orphic corpus of forty-six texts published so far. This and the following (cat. no. 106) are so far unique cases (incision on coins is an extremely rare practice), in that the gold coin incised with the name of the deceased simultaneously meets two of the deceased's needs, the burial-coin practice and that of the incised epistomion.

Coin/epistomion preserved in excellent condition. The coin was smoothed so much that its obverse and reverse are barely visible; the name of the deceased is incised in two lines on the lower two thirds of the obverse; in line 2 the lower half of the right vertical of the eta is missing owing to lack of space.

Obverse Ξεναρίστη.

Xenariste.

The lettering is similar to that of cat. no. 105. The gold coin is a trihemiobol of a stater of Philip II. For the incision, see cat. no. 105.

It was found in the cranium area of the deceased female. This text also is similar to cat. no. 103, and it is text F9, according to the classification of the small Bacchic-Orphic corpus of forty-six texts published so far.
